Speaking Part 1 · Describir, comparar y especular (2 fotos · 3 preguntas, ~45 s c/u)

Tarea: Mira dos imágenes: un mercado tradicional y una compra por internet. 1) Describe lo que ves. 2) Compara las dos formas de comprar. 3) Especula sobre cómo cambiará comprar en el futuro.

Respuesta modelo:

1) Describe: The first image teems with the sensory abundance of a traditional market, stalls groaning with produce, vendors and customers locked in good-natured negotiation, whereas the second distills shopping down to a single, solitary tap on a screen.

2) Compare: What truly divides them is the texture of the experience. The market is irreducibly social and rooted in place; online retail, for all its frictionless convenience and limitless choice, is fundamentally a transaction stripped of human warmth.

3) Speculate: As for what lies ahead, I'd hazard that e-commerce will only tighten its grip, perhaps dissolving altogether into the fabric of daily life. And yet I'd wager the market endures, reinvented as ritual and spectacle, precisely because it offers the one thing an algorithm never can: genuine human contact.

Speaking Part 2 · Tema abstracto (3 preguntas · 1 min prep + ~2 min)

Tarea: Habla sobre el impacto de la tecnología en la forma en que nos comunicamos. Responde: ¿cómo ha cambiado? ¿qué ventajas y desventajas tiene? ¿cómo será en el futuro?

Respuesta modelo:

It would be hard to overstate how radically technology has rewired the way we communicate. In the space of a single generation, we've leapt from letters and landlines to a permanently connected world of messaging, video and social media. The benefits scarcely need rehearsing: communication has become instantaneous, virtually free and gloriously borderless, which has let me nurture intimate friendships with people I rarely see in the flesh. It has also flung open the gates of public expression to voices history would once have silenced. And yet the reckoning is just as real. The relentless tug of our devices steadily corrodes the art of undivided, face-to-face attention, and the flattening of tone in a bare text breeds misunderstanding at every turn. Therein lies the great irony of our age: never more connected, never more prone to a peculiar isolation. Peering ahead, I fully expect communication to grow ever more immersive, with video and virtual reality steadily eroding distance. Even so, I'd stake a good deal on the conviction that nothing will ever truly supplant the irreplaceable richness of two people talking, unmediated, in the same room.

Speaking Part 3 · Presentación sobre un tema (1 min prep · ~90 s)

Tarea: Haz una breve presentación equilibrada: ¿debería el transporte público ser gratuito para todos? Da tu opinión y justifícala (1 min para preparar · ~90 s).

Respuesta modelo:

Weighing it all up, I come down decisively in favour of free public transport, even if I'd be the first to concede it's no panacea. The environmental case is well-nigh unanswerable: make travel free and you tempt vast numbers out of their cars, loosening the stranglehold of congestion and foul air on our cities. Layered on top is a compelling matter of equity, for mobility is the precondition of opportunity, and its absence falls most cruelly on those already struggling. The standard rejoinder, naturally, is cost, the shortfall must be borne by the taxpayer, and that is never an easy sell. Yet I'd contend that this is exactly the sort of far-sighted investment a serious society ought to embrace, since the returns, cleaner air, freer-flowing streets and a genuine boost to social mobility, dwarf the outlay many times over. In the final analysis, it's less an expense than a declaration of what we choose to value.

Speaking Part 4 · Pregunta de seguimiento sobre tu presentación (sin prep · ~45 s)

Tarea: Pregunta de seguimiento sobre tu presentación (sin tiempo de preparación, ~45 s): «¿Sería justo el transporte público gratuito para quienes apenas lo usan, como la gente que vive en el campo?»

Respuesta modelo:

It's a perfectly legitimate objection, and I'd be wary of brushing it aside. True, rural communities would reap fewer immediate rewards, given how thin provision tends to be out there. Yet equity in public spending has never hinged on each of us extracting identical personal benefit; we all bankroll services we may never set foot in. And the broader dividends, cleaner air and a slimmer carbon footprint, redound to the whole of society, villages included.
